Technical Field The present invention relates to telecommunications call centers and more particularly to a system and method for providing unified calling card numbers for callers. 2. Related Art Recently, credit card calling services have become popular for calling card based businesses such as banks, utility companies and telemarketers. Callers often utilize these services to reach destinations in countries where no public switched telephone network (PSTN) is available. Callers typically call a destination with a PSTN based calling card and then enter a destination number via a touch tone telephone keypad or remote computer. After the destination number has been entered, the caller presses the "call" button on the calling card and waits for a connection to be established with the called party. The calling card number and destination number are then displayed on the callers' caller identity display. Such systems, however, are inconvenient for callers. To call a destination with a PSTN based calling card, the caller must acquire a calling card before or during the calling session. The caller must then remember or record the calling card number or the calling card number must be entered via the touch tone telephone keypad or remote computer. The destination number must also be entered via the touch tone telephone keypad or remote computer. The combination of all of these steps can be frustrating and error prone. In fact, much of the frustration comes from the need for a caller to get the calling card number before he or she can dial the destination number. Further, after a caller has dialed the destination number, the calling card number has to be entered before the call can

DNA evidence: DNA fragments from three swabs taken from the desk in the break-in room were consistent with a mixture of DNA from two people. Blood on the suitcases: The policemen testified that they found blood on a suit-case left behind in the hotel room. The room was cleaned with a Clorox solution before the police arrived, so the blood could not be found. The room was not cleaned immediately because the police department didn't think they needed to. As you can see in the video above, the FBI was able to use the DNA evidence to help convict Larkes with the charges he now faces. In fact, the Army used the technology to help convict another Larkes this year in connection with a murder case. Now that he's been convicted, why wouldn't he plead guilty and save the taxpayers money? The simple answer to this question is that Larkes pleaded not guilty to the charges and claimed to be framed, which means he's asking for a jury trial. Unfortunately for him, the likelihood of a jury finding him not guilty is, as the saying goes, "next to nil."Oxidation and renal clearance of 1-cyclopropyl-4-phenyl-4-hydroxybutyrate during acute dehydration. 1. We have previously shown that a new osmolyte, 1-cyclopropyl-4-phenyl-4-hydroxybutyrate (CPPHB), when given to rats in large doses, can produce a reduction in total osmolality to levels similar to those caused by severe acute dehydration. Experiments were designed to test whether or not the CPPHB-treated rats gain weight less than dehydrated controls because the drug enters the body more rapidly. 2. Male Sprague-Dawley rats were hydrated or dehydrated for 48 h by removing progressively more water from the drinking water. They were then treated with either CPPHB (18 mmol/kg as sodium salt) or an equal volume of water for the next 24 h. 3. The relative extents to which the drug and water had penetrated the body at 48 h (area under the curve ratio) were the same in both groups, suggesting that CPPHB penetrated the body at the same rate as water. The rats that had been dehydrated for 48 h and given CPPHB had gained weight at the same rate as non-CPPHB-treated dehydrated
